This image shows a severely damaged piece of material, possibly a book cover or endpaper, made of a dark brown, fibrous substance. The surface is covered in numerous small, circular holes, known as wormholes, which are characteristic of insect infestation. The material is heavily discolored, with shades of brown, tan, and black, indicating age and damage. The texture is rough and uneven, with visible fibers and layers. The edges of the material are frayed and worn, revealing a lighter color underneath. There is no text or other markings on the surface.
